The upcoming BlackBerry PlayBook is drawing tremendous enthusiasms from the general public, as this particular tablet would feature some extraordinary features, such as the ability to run Adobe's applications based on the Flash and Adobe Air platforms. In fact, the BlackBerry PlayBook was featured at the Adobe MAX conference lately, and apparently, both the companies would be working side-by-side in developing the BlackBerry PlayBook.

On the other hand, Adobe would be releasing an Air SDK which would be specifically designed for the BlackBerry PlayBook's QNX-based platform. However, the BlackBerry PlayBook won't be available until early next year, and I'm guessing that developers are already anxiously waiting for the release.

And with Adobe working hand-in-hand with RIM for the BlackBerry PlayBook, I'm guessing that this would definitely dominate the tablet market with tons of applications.
